

SOCIETY and PERSONAL ACTIVITIES of WOMEN

SOCIETY

The marriage of Paye McCullough, daughter of Mrs. Lucille McCullough, 1966 LaSalle st., to Melvin Meek took place Saturday evening at 8:30 o'clock. Rev. Louis F. John of the United Brethren church officiated.

The bride was beautifully gowned in light blue chiffon tulle draped with white shadow over lace. She carried a beautiful bouquet of pink roses and lilies of the valley.

The couple was attended by the groom's brother, Charles Meek, and Dorothy McCasus. About 35 friends and relatives attended.

Mr. and Mrs. Meek will return from a brief honeymoon Nov. 15 and will reside at 1963 LaSalle st.

FOR GIRLS IN THEIR TEENS

Chic Velvetene Frocks Are Serviceable and Smart for Afternoons

By ANNETTE BRADSHAW

THE girl in her early teens can be justly proud of a becoming frock in velvetene. It is probably her first one of this material, and she feels very grown-up, for it reminds her of Mother's velvet.

The velvetene frock need not come under the head of a luxury, though it is a lovely, rich fabric. It wears quite as well as any other fabric of more serviceable aspect and it is adaptable to many occasions. It makes a smart frock for afternoon wear and is not at all out of place for morning.

Navy velvetene makes the model at the left, which is simply cut, with straight waist and slightly circular skirt. The blouse portion is stitched in gay red, green and yellow silk, while the frock is girdled in a tube of navy velvetene.

The other frock is of a rich brown tone and combines cream flannel with velvetene by a clever lacing of brown grosgrain ribbon. The flannel is applied in a fold at the skirt and sleeves and reappears as an insert at the neckline.

Revelations of A Wife

By ADELE GARRISON

I wasted no time on questions, but rushed out of the room and the house at Lillian's behest.

Forgetting all my usual terror of the big barn, pitch black inside, I climbed into Dicky's car—the operative who went for Dr. Pettit had taken my smaller one. I found—and was back in front of the house again with but the loss of a minute or two.

I left the engine running, and coming through the hall, snatched from the hall closet a warm motor coat and a close-fitting hat, and put them on as I made my way back to the library. Lillian looked at me with approval as I entered, fully clad for the journey.

"Fifty footwork," she commented, and I rushed with pleasure at the characteristic commendation. I opened the desk, took out my purse, looked inside to be sure that money and my auto license were there, and turned to Lillian, who was speaking rapidly, crisply.

"There isn't a drug store open in the country at this hour of course," she said. "And Smith says it's doubtful if they have it, anyway. I'm inclined to believe him, so that leaves just one place—the hospital. Better run Briggs out and telephone from there. If they're not tied up at the hospital perhaps they'll see somebody who can't, you'll have to go all the way. Good hunting!"

Her lips compressed tightly though her eyes smiled at me, and I knew that she keenly regretted the necessity of sending me out on the lonely ride at that hour of the night. But she did me the justice to know that I would have resented any open expression of sympathy, and I went away more heartened with her simple phrase than I would have been with a whole paragraph of nervous solicitude.

As I climbed into the car a win above me opened—I identified it as one from my father's room—and Allen Drake's voice spoke authoritatively:

"Where are you going?"

It was one thing to bow to Lillian's authority, it was another to accept meekly the dictatorial attitude of this man who had alternately fascinated and repelled me. My answer was curt:

"To the hospital."

"Why?"

"To get an antidote for the poison."

"So she managed it," he said in a tone which registered disappointment, and I knew that he savagely regretted the lost chance to punish Smith with a dose of what Tom Chester had suffered. His next words alarmed me.

"You're not going alone at this. I'll go with you. I'm not needed here for a little while."

"You're not needed here, either," I said audaciously, as he lowered the window. He threw it up again instantly.

"What did you say?" he demanded. I repeated the words, and knew by the change in his tone that I had offended him mortally.

He said, "and I insist upon coming with you."

"You'll have to run fairly fast, then," I retorted, as I threw in the clutch and sent the car purring along the driveway.

The window slammed down viciously, and I laughed lightly to myself at the sheer joy of outwitting the self-satisfied Mr. Drake.

But before I had gone many rods the darkness—unusually dense, with every tree and bush a menacing shadow—seemed to press down upon me, and to my own chagrin astonishment I found myself regretting that I had not accepted Mr. Drake's offer.

It was too late to turn back, however, as I went along the road my lamps picked out at a lively clip. When I turned into the Briggs driveway it was with a feeling that for a few minutes at least I had a temporary haven.

I sounded my horn, and soon Mr. Briggs, in bathrobe and slippers, leaning upon a cane and holding a lantern in the other hand, appeared at the door.

"Bless my soul," he said in his hammy, hearty way. "It's Mrs. Garrison. Is everything all right up there?"

there? I haven't heard anything, of course, and this pesky leg of mine is troubling me so I couldn't get over even if they had heard me."

I explained briefly, punctuated with expressions of dismay from Mr. Briggs, and at my request for a telephone he led the way to his sitting room and rang the connection for me with a fussy nervousness which betrayed how real was his concern for Tom Chester.

ADVICE TO GIRLS

By Annie Laurie

I am a young man deeply in love with a girl two years my junior. I was love at first sight with me, and I have loved her ever since.

She is a lovely girl, but so sarcastic that I sometimes dread seeing her. She thinks nothing of embarrassing me in public, and saying things that sting me bitterly. I cannot propose to her, though I want to. I may meet sarcasm in her reply. Anyway, I would not want to marry her unless she broke this habit. I cannot believe that it is more than a habit that has attached itself to my girl.

What can I do? I love her in spite of this.

HERMAN HEART THROBS.

Have you spoken nicely to your friend and told her frankly that she hurts you with her sarcasm? Do not propose to her unless you are sure you would be very happy with her.

DEAR ANNIE LAURIE:

We are two girls in our teens, and would like your advice.

We have known two young men about three weeks. Would it be proper for us to go out riding with them and go to dances and shows if our mothers object?

What time would it be proper to be home? How could we talk to our mothers so that they would allow us to go with these young men?

They are gentlemen. Everybody who knows them says they are fine young men. Would it be proper for us to meet them on the street or let them call at our home?

BUTTERFLY AND TOOTSIE.

Don't go out with the young men unless you have your parents' permission, my dears. Have an affectionate talk with your mothers, and see if they will not allow you to receive the young men in your homes. This is the only proper way for you to meet them. Anything else is undignified and also unfair to your parents.
